care for, and they come in a wide variety of colors and patterns. This book will provide you with everything you need to know to successfully keep and breed these fascinating creatures. We will cover topics such as housing, feeding, breeding, and health care. Whether you are a beginner or an experienced herpetoculturist, this book is sure to have something for you. Let's get started!

Day Geckos

Day geckos are a group of small, diurnal geckos that are native to Madagascar and the Comoros Islands. They are known for their bright colors and patterns, and they are popular pets in the reptile hobby. The most common species of day gecko kept in captivity is the Madagascar giant day gecko. This species can grow to be up to 10 inches in length, and it comes in a variety of colors, including green, blue, red, and orange. Day geckos are relatively easy to care for, and they are a good choice for beginner herpetoculturists.

Tokay Geckos

Tokay geckos are a group of large, nocturnal geckos that are native to Southeast Asia. They are known for their loud, distinctive call, which they use to attract mates and defend their territory. Tokay geckos can grow to be up to 15 inches in length, and they come in a variety of colors, including brown, gray, and green. Tokay geckos are not as easy to care for as day geckos, and they are not a good choice for beginner herpetoculturists. However, they can be rewarding pets for experienced herpetoculturists who are willing to provide them with the proper care.

native to the island of New Caledonia. They are known for their unusual appearance, which includes a large head, a short tail, and a prehensile tongue. New Caledonian geckos can grow to be up to 10 inches in length, and they come in a variety of colors, including green, brown, and gray. New Caledonian geckos are not as easy to care for as day geckos or tokay geckos, and they are not a good choice for beginner herpetoculturists. However, they can be rewarding pets for experienced herpetoculturists who are willing to provide them with the proper care.

Other Geckos

In addition to day geckos, tokay geckos, and New Caledonian geckos, there are many other species of geckos that can be kept in captivity. These include the leopard gecko, the crested gecko, the giant day gecko, and the mourning gecko. Each species of gecko has its own unique set of care requirements, so it is important to research the specific species you are interested in before bringing it home. Geckos are fascinating creatures that can make great pets. With proper care, they can live for many years and bring you years of enjoyment.

Herpetocultural Care

The herpetocultural care of geckos involves providing them with the proper environment to meet their needs. This includes providing them with the right temperature, humidity, lighting, and food. It is also important to keep their enclosure clean and to provide them with enrichment activities. The specific care requirements of geckos will vary depending on the species, so it is important to research
